The discovery and characterization of the rare human genetic disorder called I-cell disease had led to the prediction that lysosomal enzymes shared a common recognition marker that mediated organelle-specific uptake into cells. The blockade of this uptake by mannose 6-phosphate but not glucose 6-phosphate then led to the correct prediction that the glycans on these enzymes must selectively express a novel phosphomannosyl marker that was recognized by specific receptors, which might mediate both intra- and intercellular trafficking of these enzymes to their correct destination in lysosomes.

Since the evangelists are convinced that the new birth is within the power and ability of man's will, their man-made "metaphysics" has become far more important than the theology of the Bible. Bible and organization and advertising are absolute essentials to success while the necessary work of the Holy Ghost is all but forgotten.
